

These institutions already have too much access to information about individuals. They simply fail to recognize the fact that people do not want to be bothered during what little time they have outside of work by companies forceing their way into our personal lives. Everyone I know becomes angry with these calls, and wishes the laws were much more stringent in stopping such frivolous interruptions.